

Exercise 3: Survey design

Here is an example of a survey that was developed for an MBA dissertation. Read the background information below, which explains the purpose of the survey, and then read the survey itself.

- which questions do you think are good, and why?
- which questions are not so good? and
- how could they be improved?

The 'Background information' below was not part of the survey communicated to respondents. We have put it here so that you can see the stated purpose of the survey. The conceptual model was developed from a review of relevant literature and demonstrates an attempt to relate the survey to published theories.

The survey seen by the respondents had a cover page that explained in broad terms the purpose of the project, thanked the participant for taking part, and encouraged them to answer honestly.

The survey was made available on the Google Forms platform

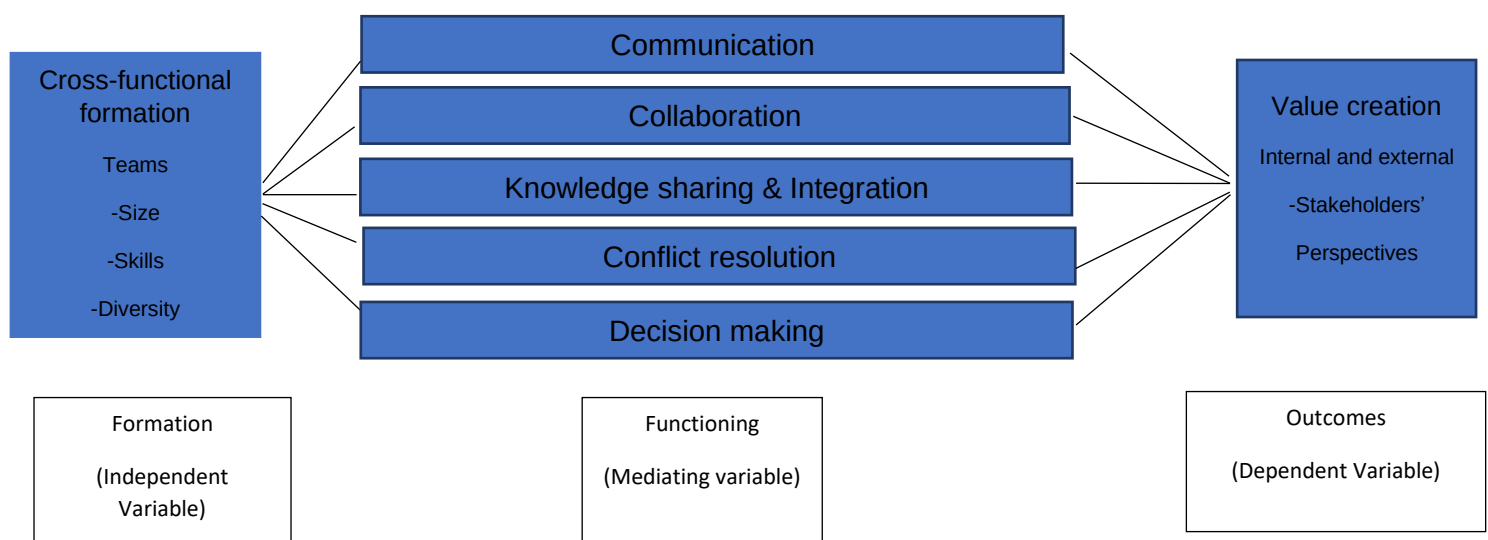

Background information

The survey was designed and distributed as the main tool to gather data for a research project that aimed to examine the nature and influence of cross-functional teams on value creation in a particular sector in a specific geographical area.

Questions the researcher sought to answer included:

1. What factors influence the effectiveness of cross-functional teams in [this sector and this location]?
2. Does the efficacy of cross-functional teams translate to value creation in [this sector]?
3. What characteristics of cross-functional teams generate most value for stakeholders for [this sector and this location]?

A conceptual model of the focus of the research was developed, based on literature on team working.
